CED-10 and VAV-3 (Vav-3) are a mammalian homolog of the single Caenorhabditis elegans Rac-1 (CED-10) and Vav-3 protein involved in Rac-dependent cytoskeletal reorganization during mast cell activation. Here, we report that stable expression of CED-10 or Vav-3 in C. elegans eliminates key features of stress granules in germline nuclei and suppresses the germinal tumors induced by aberrant Ras-dependent expression of the tumor promoter E47 in somatic cells. This effect is independent of the presence of a functional RNAi system. As a corollary, we found that C. elegans can promote tumor formation in Drosophila when it is activated by expression of the human proto-oncogene H-Ras in the germband. Moreover, we provide evidence that wild-type nematodes and human-rodent H-Ras(V12)-transgenic mice share similar genetic and molecular defects in the germinal tumor microenvironment. These data suggest that expression of oncogenes in C. elegans can promote tumor formation in vivo and highlight the importance of the genetic background and the environmental context in cancer. # Copyright 2013 The Chromium Authors.
