In a world dominated by technology, human touch is becoming a rarity. This applies to both children and their parents. Technology is now a part of everyday life, and no one would even dream of going without it. In a world dominated by technology, human touch is becoming a rarity. (WashingtonPost.com) -- Based on the millions of hours of television, movies and video games that children watch and play, the American Academy of Pediatrics has issued new guidelines, backed by a consensus of other major medical groups, for limiting children's television, computer and video game use. The group called for reducing children's television viewing by an hour per day and reducing their playing time with computer or video games by at least an hour a day. It also suggested limiting such viewing and playing to two hours a day when the child is not engaged in something more important, like homework or chores.

The group, based in Elk Grove Village, Ill., released its advice Wednesday, a year after a similar report on adolescents. Both reports are based on a review of available studies of TV, video games and computer use among children. The AAP is not recommending a ban on these f3e1b3768c
