Expression of monocarboxylate transporter 1 and lactate metabolism in mantle cell lymphoma. Monocarboxylate transporters (MCT) are key elements of the monocarboxylic acid transporter system, which is central to lactate metabolism. Two MCTs have been described in human malignancies, MCT1 and MCT4, and their expression and function in lymphoma cells are not known. Using reverse transcription-polymerase chain reaction, immunohistochemistry and Western blot analysis, we studied MCT1 and MCT4 expression and function in mantle cell lymphoma (MCL). MCL cell lines and primary cells from MCL patients showed an increased expression of MCT1. By comparison with normal lymph node cells, the expression of MCT1 mRNA and protein was 4.8-fold and 3.4-fold higher, respectively, in MCL cell lines. A similar level of expression was observed for MCT4. The functional activity of MCT1 was measured by accumulation of [14C]lactate in the presence of dimethyl glutaric acid and butyric acid, as well as by lactate production in the presence of exogenous lactate. Functional activity of MCT1 was up-regulated in the MCL cell lines, Molt-4 and Mino, by 2.1-fold and 3.2-fold, respectively, and in peripheral blood mononuclear cells from patients with relapsed/refractory MCL (non-germinal center B cell subtype) by 2.4-fold. MCT1 expression was associated with favorable MCL prognosis and with a high proliferative index. Therefore, MCT1 may play a role in lactate metabolism in MCL cells.

What should you be doing right now to fight the coronavirus? For one, you should be staying home. Then you should be monitoring your health, taking the proper precautions, and consulting your doctor. And, if you don't have a medical condition that might make you more susceptible to the virus, you should be keeping yourself, your family, and your community healthy. Unfortunately, there is still a lot of misinformation about COVID-19, and some
