For those of us in the public sector, our decision to opt out of the Universal Credit (UC) has been – and continues to be – nothing short of heroic. But for those on the front line of UC, it has meant years of uncertainty, and poverty right at the start of the new year. It has been a dispiriting time. Indeed, it has been the definition of demoralising, as I have worked to provide what support I can to our staff. Each of my colleagues who have opted out of UC, and I, have felt the sting of that choice. We have all seen the consequences – the stress, the fatigue, the emotional drain, and the damage that takes on the lives of those who have to use it. But for those on the front line, making decisions that will impact on their own lives is difficult, especially when you have not been given enough information to enable you to make informed decisions. It is all too easy to feel stuck in the middle – torn between duty and despair. But the simple fact is that we cannot afford to continue with UC. In 2020, we are still spending a cumulative £12bn on UC – a figure that will keep rising. But we do not have the money for it. In fact, since the new budget was announced, we have already been told the amount of money we get to spend on UC is being reduced. With the current level of public expenditure, we can't afford to. This will be no comfort to UC claimants. We have already seen benefits being clawed back and people losing their housing, losing their children, and facing destitution. It is cruel to ask people to rely on UC at a time when our economy needs so many people to be putting their shoulder to the wheel. Yet this is what our policies demand.
