The vote, 235-192, essentially did not matter because the Senate already approved a temporary fix to government funding. But it allowed House leaders to appear tough on immigration, despite having promised to punt if a final deal could not be reached with the White House. The immigration debate dominated the contentious funding talks. Republican House Speaker John Boehner refused to ask his members to support the temporary spending bill unless it included a provision that would allow the deportation of millions of immigrants who are living in the United States illegally. White House Chief of Staff Denis McDonough warned the House leadership that its stance was undermining the chances of striking an immigration deal, according to a senior administration official. The warning was not heeded, the official said. Aides to Boehner and Majority Leader Eric Cantor said they were ready to extend government funding for another month to give House members more time to hammer out an immigration deal with the president. "We want to get on that. We're ready to have a serious conversation with the president about this," Cantor told reporters. "The president, as I understand it, is willing to have 3ef4e8ef8d
