The aim of this study is to determine the prevalence of scapular notching and the factors influencing its development in patients with giant cell tumor of bone. We conducted a retrospective review of the records of patients with pathologically proven giant cell tumor of bone who had undergone surgery. All patients had chest radiographs and computed tomography (CT) studies. Fifty-eight patients with giant cell tumors of bone (31 females, 27 males) with a mean age of 35.5 years (range, 10-80 years) were identified. Of these, 24 (41%) had notched scapulae and 34 (60%) had a scapular lesion on the postoperative CT. Twenty-two patients had involvement of only the scapula, four patients had involvement of the scapula and chest wall, and two patients had chest wall involvement alone. Of the 24 patients with notched scapulae, 23 were asymptomatic and only one had symptoms referable to the scapula. The scapular lesion in the 34 patients with a postoperative CT was confirmed on scintigraphy in 29 patients (85%), CT in 3 patients (9%), magnetic resonance imaging in 2 patients (6%), and scintigraphy and CT in 2 patients (6%). In all cases with a scapular lesion on CT, the scapula was notched. This study found a high incidence of notched scapulae in patients with giant cell tumor of bone. The presence of notching was significantly related to the age of the patient, tumor size, and scapular lesion on CT. The scapula should be evaluated preoperatively and scapular notching, if present, should be noted on imaging studies.// Jest Snapshot v1, exports[~Toolbar/mobileStyle should match the snapshot 1
