A new deadly virus spread by mosquitos is pushing deer and caribou herds in Alaska out of their traditional habitats and into urban areas. The virus, known as Alkhurma, killed at least four people in Saudi Arabia last summer after the first recognized cases in December. Most of the people affected were Saudi tourists to Yemen, which is battling Houthi rebels with support from the kingdom. In Alaska, some 600 caribou and more than 200 deer have been infected in four counties in the past two years, said Jay Aylward, director of wildlife for the Alaska Department of Fish and Game. "Alkhurma is a serious disease," Aylward said. "The big thing is once you get infected, you stay infected." The disease first popped up in the White Mountains of southwest Alaska in July 2018, when a caribou died from the virus. In the next six months, at least 25 other caribou, and perhaps dozens more, tested positive for the disease. RELATED: First case of deadly virus linked to Zika reported in Utah In June, the same virus hit deer, with three more infected deer in the Chugach Mountains of southwest Alaska tested in the past week. Public health officials and wildlife biologists suspect a virus carried by a mosquito spreading in the Lower 48 and carried by boats traveling to Alaska's coasts in the summer. "It's a pretty dire situation," Aylward said. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and the U.S. Food and Drug Administration are advising against travel to Yemen, and airlines have limited flights to the country. The CDC recommends travelers in the Middle East to avoid mosquito bites. It is uncertain how many people in the state have been infected. Aylward said four infected caribou were tested. Three died from the disease. The fourth caribou remains in the herd, and tests will determine whether it has been infected with the disease. Aylward said one of the caribou was found dead in Sitka, the state capital. Another was found in Petersburg. The third car
