With PDF files, the text is embedded into the actual file, so changes are permanent and the resulting file is exactly what's on the screen. However, with Acrobat, you get to modify the text while it's in the document, and you can make changes to page layout (such as adding or removing pages). Figure 6-2. With Acrobat, you can make changes to text in the document (top), reorder the pages (middle), or change the layout (bottom).) shows some of the ways that you can alter a PDF document. You can also add a copyright notice to your document, or add a watermark. (Watermarks are subtle logos that appear on the bottom of the document.) To make a PDF file, you have to create a .template_ —a file that, when you open it, automatically creates a new document based on the template. You can also open up an existing document and use the Tools → Edit → Convert to PDF command. The bulk of the Acrobat program is devoted to editing PDF documents, and the program includes a lot of features, including digital signature, image in PDF, and text and numbering options. Figure 6-3. Q: How to iterate through an array that has variable length elements? I am pulling data from a database using MariaDB. Each row contains an array that needs to be iterated through. I am passing an array to a function and looping through it (both with a foreach loop) and rendering the fields, but one of the elements is a variable. The variable is essentially the length of the field. However, the foreach loop ends up rendering the last element in the array as the last one in the form. I understand why this is, since I need to be accessing the elements of the array after the last variable. But I am not sure how to fix it, since I cannot figure out how to rewrite the foreach loop to reflect the length of the array. Here is the code I have so far: `function get_values($data) { $con = get_connection(); foreach($data as $row) { $name = $row['name']; $company = $row['company']; $address = $row['address']; $city = $row['city']; $state = $row['state']; $zip = $row['zip']; $email = $row['email']; $phone = $row['phone']; $website = $row['website']; $form_id = $row['form_id']; $websites_id = $row['websites_id']; $last_updated = $row['last_updated']; $retrieved = $row['retrieved']; $created = $row['created']; $updated = $row['updated']; $extracted_name = strip_tags($name);`
