I've noticed that many people working to reduce poverty begin by positing that excessive governmental intervention is the problem. It is only logical to argue against inefficiency and corruption, but the policy space to tackle poverty is also constrained by factors such as inadequate supply of essential public goods, human rights violations, the unwillingness of mainstream markets to engage in certain socially challenging activities and (most importantly) the implicit assumption that markets can only provide the distributional effects that reduce poverty when individual choices are free. The most common form of development intervention is a set of subsidies to assist resource poor households. Direct cash transfers, conditional on schooling, work performance, and health, are the most common tool to improve efficiency in poor households. This policy may be an attempt to prevent trading off consumption today for more schooling or health in future. However, the implications of cash transfers are not always clear-cut. Sometimes, additional income leads to more investments in health or education while in other cases it might lead to increased alcohol consumption and decreased savings. In addition, we're not always able to count on that cash is spent in ways that actually improve income. There are very few country-level examples of international aid that can unequivocally be documented to reduce poverty, but it is clear that cash transfers to the very
