More particularly, it relates to a semiconductor laser device of the type which is designed so that energy emitted from a semiconductor laser element is converted into an optical signal and the optical signal is led to an outside of a semiconductor device via a feeding optical fiber. Generally, in a semiconductor laser device, a semiconductor laser element is mounted on a stem made of an electrically insulating material such as a ceramic and surrounded by a casing. In the casing, laser optical coupling elements are arranged to guide emitted laser beams emitted from the semiconductor laser element. The laser optical coupling elements of the semiconductor laser device which has the foregoing arrangement have such a problem that when electric power is applied to the semiconductor laser element mounted on the stem, the arrangement thereof is deteriorated due to heating, or the laser beam is once emitted from the semiconductor laser element, but cannot be led to the outside of the stem due to poorness of optical coupling characteristic. In order to eliminate the foregoing problem, Japanese Unexamined Patent Publication Nos. 64-64224 and 1-172530 disclose a semiconductor laser device of the type in which laser beams emitted from a semiconductor laser element are radiated in a direction approximately perpendicular to the longitudinal direction of the stem and, after being reflected by a reflecting element disposed on the stem, the laser beams are guided to a feeding optical fiber. This semiconductor laser device is of the type that in the vicinity of the reflecting element provided on the stem, a coupling member which couples the stem to a substrate with a high coupling
