Social Effects of Immigrants' Cultures, Language, and Socioeconomic Status on Negotiating Congruent and Incongruent Situations. The authors examined how adopting immigrants' cultures, languages, and socioeconomic statuses (SES) impact negotiations in the laboratory. Participants were 114 native Dutch and immigrant undergraduate students, who were randomly assigned to a basic negotiation condition or a negotiation condition with ethnicity or SES tasks. For these results, the authors suggest future research regarding the potentially negative socioeconomic experiences of immigrants, that it may be the everyday sociocultural realities immigrants face, not just the laboratory-based conditions they are exposed to, that leads to lower negotiation performance.
