CVE-2019-18808. These errors can be detected by the Dll error reporting mechanism provided by Windows. A dll error may be issued by a binary program. . Mounting the Volume /system/app. B81D0161-7A65-4E65-94CA-E00B9D37D913. Nov 23, 2019 A: From your comments, you are trying to refer back to a folder on your hard drive that you deleted by mistake. You can probably get a list of files you deleted with: $ find -mtime -1 This should give a list of files you deleted within the last one minute I would recommend to use the following command to list all of your files $ sudo ls -lR.* P.S. I would use.* instead of specifying the exact directory, in case you deleted some other files. Update: @Zeno, since you have changed your question to refer to.* instead, all your files will be listed here. Now that you are looking for the files you deleted by mistake, it's time to get them back. While it's not the cleanest solution, I would suggest to copy the list of files you deleted before you deleted it, and then move them back to their rightful place. This should get you started: # copy back all your files $ sudo cp -R.* /User/username/Desktop # move the new files into place, where they belong $ sudo mv /User/username/Desktop/* /Users/username/Desktop/ # clean up and enjoy the new files on your desktop $ sudo rm -r /Users/username/Desktop/* Q: Creating a file and writing a string to it in C I am using Windows, and I have a file I would like to create and fill in with strings. I am trying to avoid using system calls and other non-standard methods as that could violate my code's license. An example of what I want to do: FILE *fh = fopen(...) // 3da54e8ca3
