(from articles are known in the art for use in window applications such as insulating glass (IG) window units, vehicle windows, and/or the like. In certain example instances, designers of coated articles often strive for a combination of high visible transmission, a low color shift in the direction of view, high durability, and low emissivity (or low-E). Low-E coatings are desirable because they allow for significant fuel savings when incorporated into IG window units, vehicle windows, and/or other suitable housings or coverings. Low-E coatings, however, can sometimes permit significant visible transmission, which is undesirable in certain applications. Thus, it is often desirable to have a low-E coating with excellent IR (heat rejection) performance and good visible transmission, for example. Low-E coatings, when viewed from an angle, have an interference grating effect. More specifically, the average visible transmission and the color shift in the direction of view of low-E coatings are dependent on the thickness of the coating. Thus, it is desirable to balance the color shift in the direction of view (however slightly) with the transmission to obtain a desirable coating. Balancing the color shift and the transmission of a coating can be especially challenging when the coating is applied to a glass substrate having a dark coating on one surface thereof, such as a dark-colored IG window unit for a vehicle. Thus, it will be appreciated that there exists a need in the art for a coated article that is able to provide a combination of desirable visible transmission, a low color shift in the direction of view, and/or desirable IR performance. In certain example embodiments of this invention, a coated article comprising a coating supported by a glass
