Research organizations are cutbacks, centralisation, and DRM - zacw114 ===== quantile I'm not sure I see the justification for calling a publishing organization "open access". By "open access" people are normally referring to making the scientific articles freely and instantly accessible to the public, with no login requirement. But an academic publishing organization is exactly the opposite of this. In fact, in most cases, the reason people pay for an "open access" journal is because they don't want the article freely available to the public. The reason they pay to have the article is because they want the article used, quoted, or cited. If they are not written up, they won't be used and cited. And citations are all that truly matters in the publishing world. ~~~ zacw114 The point I was trying to make was that just because you have an open access journal doesn't mean it's free and open. The scientific community still maintains control over how their research is shared, even if it is freely available to the public. ~~~ Turing_Machine And that's fine. While not everybody will read the peer-reviewed articles in a
