Q: If my wife used my Credit Card as the backup to her checking account when a problem arose, could she be charged with a crime? My wife and I have been married for about 4 years now and she has been co-signing for me on my credit cards. When I tried to pay off the one credit card with it's $100 minimum payment and I couldn't pay it off, she called up one of the creditors to try to get the card paid off for me. This was in the middle of the night and in the middle of her work day. She was nervous because the card was already $150 over-due. I think she was trying to stop a fraudulent transaction from happening. I told her to wait over the weekend, to try to talk to me first, to call the bank the next day and that I would work on it. She agreed to do all of those things. I didn't call her until after she had done all of those things. Then I told her that I couldn't do it so she gave me the card to try and do it on my own. She should have told me that I couldn't do it so that I would have checked with my bank to see if they would give me the balance of my card to try and pay it down. Then we talked about it again and I told her I couldn't do it and that I would try and call my bank. I called my bank and they were extremely helpful and tried to help me out. The problem was that my card had a pending charge for a $50.00 Amazon Gift Card. The reason why I couldn't pay it off was because I had been selling things on Amazon and buying the matching ones back so I didn't have enough money to pay for the $50.00 of the card. There were other pending charges of that same card totaling $175.00 so I was worried that I would get a fine for the pending charges. Then that night I got an email telling me about the pending charges on the card. I didn't notice it because I wasn't looking at the email and even if I had
