Disclaimer : Infoworld is not responsible for the content of external internet sites.For many years, an easy and convenient way to apply a film of material to a patient's skin has been by means of an adhesive material that can be warmed to a desired application temperature and then can be placed against the skin and allowed to cool in order to set the adhesive. The material is removed from the skin by tearing it off, which can be a difficult and messy task. Also, the material can leave behind uncomfortable adhesive residue on the skin. To avoid the use of an adhesive, the material must be applied to the skin in such a way that it sets without becoming sticky. This requires a certain amount of skill and effort. One method that has been used for applying a film to the skin is with the aid of an aerosol can. This method has the benefit of a fluid-tight seal to keep out the atmosphere, but it still has some of the problems that were described with respect to the adhesive. A pressurized can can create an uncomfortable amount of pressure against the skin, and an adhesive can be left behind on the skin. Another method is by means of a roll of material that is pulled off the roll with an applicator. This method has the benefit of simplicity and ease of use. The material can be very thin, and there is little possibility of leaving adhesive residue on the skin. The aforementioned problems are addressed by a new device described in U.S. Pat. No. 6,536,836 to Szumierecky et al. The device is a dispenser that includes a roll of tape that is adhered to a core by a thin layer of adhesive. The roll of tape is wrapped around the core, and the tape is drawn off by rotating the core.
