Risk of cancer in female lung cancer patients with and without thyroid dysfunction. Lung cancer and thyroid dysfunction both have major impacts on patient prognosis. The survival of lung cancer patients with thyroid dysfunction has not been well established. We tested whether thyroid dysfunction is associated with an increased risk of cancer in females. Between 2003 and 2008, data from a population-based database was used to identify 1,293 females with lung cancer and 96,530 matched controls. Patients with thyroid dysfunction were identified from the national Taiwan insurance database. Multiple Cox proportional hazards regression analysis showed that lung cancer patients with thyroid dysfunction had a significantly higher risk of all cancer (adjusted HR [aHR] = 1.53, 95% CI 1.18 to 1.99) and non-small cell lung cancer (NSCLC) (aHR = 2.02, 95% CI 1.27 to 3.21) compared with those without thyroid dysfunction. Among the female lung cancer patients with thyroid dysfunction, the risk of cancer was especially high in those with hyperthyroidism (aHR = 6.07, 95% CI 2.38 to 15.61) and with hypothyroidism (aHR = 2.19, 95% CI 1.26 to 3.84). A higher risk of cancer was observed in thyroid hormone-substituted patients (aHR = 2.25, 95% CI 1.08 to 4.66). Thyroid dysfunction may be an independent risk factor for cancer in female lung cancer patients. Gender differences in risk of cancer among patients with thyroid dysfunction should be identified.

Tolerability of a 7-Week Human Milk Supplementation Program in Korean Full-Term Neonates.

To assess the safety and tolerability of human milk for full-term, healthy, appropriately mature term neonates. The duration of exclusive human milk feeding for full-term, healthy, appropriately mature neonates was 7 weeks. During the 7 weeks, 15-20% of human milk was added at every feeding. During human milk supplementation, the infants were observed for signs of colic, nausea, vomiting, abdominal distension, and growth, development, and metabolism. Human milk was supplemented for a mean duration of 9.6 (\pm 1.4) days. During the feeding period, 149 of 308 neonates (48%) experienced at least one episode of colic. Mild signs
