DATE: September 30, 2012 DETAILS: On any given night at the Chase headliner cities all over the country, thousands of collegiate-aged fans turned into partygoers for a night of fun and fireworks. Student tickets have sold out for Chase events for many years now, and the idea of a weekday ticket to get a headlining show might sound like a pipe dream to fans of other teams. But as you were dreaming of scoring a night out this Saturday night with your fellow students, just remember – in some cities around the country, there is a chance that your favorite team might be playing in the late-game. And if your favorite team is staking its claim as a true contender for the national championship, chances are the tickets to the Chase are in shorter supply than your school's football team. After the SEC, the Big Ten is the second-most-entertaining conference in college sports, and the Chase headliner events are a great way to get in on the action if you're not able to hit the road. If you don't have tickets, maybe playing the game yourself is your best bet. For details on ticket availability to this weekend's Big Ten events, check out Chase.com/collegefootball. Genetic backgrounds of starch-accumulating mutant mutants in rice and barley. Starch accumulates by photosynthesis when CO₂ assimilation is activated during the day. Starch accumulates in amyloplasts in storage parenchyma cells in leaves when photosynthesis is stably inhibited. Two separate mutants (osaka1 and cs3) in rice and three mutants (bck(1), bck(2) and shr(2)) in barley accumulate starch in the amyloplasts in starchy internodes when photosynthesis is stably inhibited. A genetic map of starch-accumulating mutants was constructed. Analysis of the rice mutants revealed that two genes controlled starch accumulation by different regulatory mechanism. One of the genes controlled starch accumulation in both parenchyma cells and in endosperm cells by coding soluble starch synthase II that catalyzes the initiation of starch synthesis. The other gene controlled starch accumulation in parenchyma cells but not in endosperm cells by coding soluble starch synthase I that catalyzes the elongation of starch chains. The barley starch accumulating mutants were mapped to D-genome region on the group I chromosomes, which contained the genes for starch

State Education Superintendent Wilson S. Ayala said that, as the normal school year starts this week, the time has come for parents and teachers to begin monitoring students' actions outside of the classroom. Ayala said that these disciplinary measures are necessary in order to ensure that students learn during the school year and that schools will be able to continue to meet the needs of all students as they become older. He said the measures are backed by federal law. Ayala said that the school year of 2009-10 will be different from previous
