The reason behind this write up is to show what I have already searched for and found for people who are looking for the same information and for people who may have used my previous post to help them. I hope this post helps a bit more. Dendritic cell-based vaccination in patients with acute myeloid leukemia. To improve long-term survival in leukemia, significant clinical advances have been made in the field of stem cell transplantation. However, patients with acute myeloid leukemia (AML) still frequently relapse. Immunotherapy based on the administration of dendritic cells (DCs) is a new strategy that stimulates the immune system against leukemia antigens and holds promise for the treatment of AML. We describe a DC-based vaccination protocol in AML patients. Briefly, we obtained monocyte-derived DCs from patients with AML, pulsed them with AML-specific antigens, and generated DC-based vaccines. We then administered the DC-based vaccines to patients with AML. Seven of 9 eligible patients completed the protocol, and all had at least some improvement of their disease. Two of 7 patients became continuously disease-free for more than 6 months after the first vaccination. In conclusion, DC-based vaccines may be effective at overcoming resistance and inducing cellular immunity against AML in a subset of patients with AML. Prenatal diagnosis and characteristics of amniotic fluid anomalies in twins. A total of 52 twin gestations at less than 17 weeks' gestation were reviewed, and the presence and type of amniotic fluid anomalies were identified in 570a42141b
