No other betting calculator is as reliable. In U.S. Pat. No. 4,708,739, a conduit having a threaded end is shown. Threaded ends are generally used to connect two adjacent conduits to form a conduit string. A problem with threaded ends of this type is that, since the conduit is under axial pressure, it is likely that the threads will become loose, allowing the conduit to drop out of a support as the threads back off of the supporting surface. Also, in order to make the threaded end of the conduit, a machining operation is necessary. The machining operation is time consuming, expensive, and requires precision machining tools. It would be highly desirable to form a threaded end in a manner which does not require machining. The present invention solves the problem of loosening of the threaded connection between two adjacent conduits by providing an insert having a threaded aperture, a hole, and two tapered surfaces. The threaded aperture is adapted to fit over a threaded end of a conduit and has an outer diameter smaller than the inner diameter of the threaded end. The inner diameter of the threaded aperture is in the range of from 2 to 7% of the outer diameter of the threaded end of the conduit. The tapered surfaces are used to secure the insert in the threaded end of the conduit, and are used to resist rotation of the insert within the conduit. In an alternative embodiment, the tapered surfaces are replaced by two flat sides. For many who care about their lawns, it is an exercise in futility to let plants go to seed while they are still in the ground. Not only is the resulting plants weaker than the parent, they can also attract many insects and disease-carrying insects that are then attracted to the garden and their favorite plants. As such, a major concern for many gardeners is how to keep their gardens weed free without interfering with the natural process of seeding. Vegetable gardens and annuals have their seeding time and temperature ranges, which are key for the seeds to be fertilized and sprout. While most vegetables have their seeding time around the beginning of spring, annuals such as
