Medical treatment of a patient by a physician can involve the application of a plurality of therapeutic agents to the skin of a patient. With some such agents, it is desirable to maintain the temperature of the patient's skin at a temperature which is precisely controlled within a narrow temperature range. For example, in the treatment of psoriasis, a number of therapeutic agents, for example, 1% hydrocortisone acetate, 0.1% calcipotriene and 0.05% betamethasone dipropionate (trade name Beloc 7.5% cream) are applied by a physician to the skin of a patient to treat the psoriasis. Each of these agents has its own optimal temperature range for application to the skin of a patient, and it is desirable that the skin temperature of the patient be maintained within the optimal temperature ranges for the effective application of each of these agents.
