Hypogonadism is now recognized as an important, modifiable determinant of cardiovascular disease (CVD) and diabetes, but its epidemiology in type 2 diabetes is unclear, and a practical definition of hypogonadism is lacking. This is in contrast to the significant and established association with type 1 diabetes, and the need to develop guidelines for screening in type 2 diabetes has been emphasized in recent reports. We have therefore studied a group of patients to determine if hypogonadism can be distinguished from normal aging, and if it is associated with diabetes or other cardiovascular risk factors. We evaluated clinical characteristics and hormone concentrations in 206 men attending our endocrinology clinic. Men with a history of CVD or cancer, known polycystic ovary syndrome, or untreated testosterone deficiency were excluded, as were users of certain medications or drugs affecting the sex steroid axis. Fasting blood samples were analyzed for LH, FSH, testosterone, free testosterone, and sex hormone binding globulin, and anthropometry and CVD risk factors were recorded. Of the 206 men (64 +/- 8 years, BMI 27 +/- 3 kg/m2), 16 (7%) had evidence of testosterone deficiency (free testosterone Q: How to make tableView change tableViewCell's height when height is fixed?
