14 мая 2014 At last. So, I know I probably shouldn't be putting this out there before the episode has aired, but I had an epiphany this morning while I was pulling out my cables to get ready for a marathon of old episodes of the

Simpsons, on which I was cosplaying as Lisa. I suddenly realised that between the time I first saw the internet and the time I started work I realised that the issue with boobs and nipples on-screen, in games, or indeed movies, is not an all-or-nothing deal. After all, there are people making and watching games and movies all around the world and I don't think most of them have the same culture as I have. Some of them live in countries where they don't necessarily have women who are very aware of their breasts in a way that in the UK and the US, for example, we are aware of them, whether we like them or not. Part of that is the way we're all exposed to women's bodies in films and television and games and the way women's bodies are made to look in art. I don't think that is necessarily the fault of the UK or the US. Men made the cultural assumptions that a small pair of breasts were little to nothing and hence it made sense to not have them on-screen and if they were big and bouncy and the men liked them, well, that's great. But the world has changed. More women than men play video games. We're all aware of women's breasts and nipples, we can choose to watch them or not, so the problem with people trying to get people to be interested in boobs or nipples on-screen isn't about making a decision that they have to take up whatever options you put in front of them, it's about making a decision that they are suddenly given options that they didn't have before. Because having more options really doesn't equate to having more or less problems. If you have more options there are fewer things that trouble you than there are if you have fewer options. There are some extremes, like there's no possible way to 'sex up'
