[High vagal tone in depression]. The author maintains that the autonomic nervous system plays a critical role in the pathogenesis of depression, although not in a functional way. The sympathetic nervous system is supposed to be involved in such pathogenic mechanisms as the immune response, the endocrine function, and the neurotransmitters. The parasympathetic nervous system seems to be related to the hypothalamo-pituitary axis through the hypothalamic "suicide center". Consequently, a high parasympathetic tone is related to higher depression scores. Specifically, sympathetic and parasympathetic activity are supposed to be involved in the mechanisms of action of the classical antidepressant drugs.

Effects of fish feeding on mercury bioaccumulation, in situ lipid peroxidation, and lipid metabolism in sardine (Sardina pilchardus L.) This study examines the effects of dietary fish on mercury (Hg) bioaccumulation and the formation of lipid hydroperoxides (LOOH) in an open ocean-like system. A six-week feeding experiment with Atlantic sardine (Sardina pilchardus L.), fed and unfed, was carried out in a seawater closed system (San Antonio Bay, San Juan Island, Washington State). The Atlantic sardine was fed with a commercial diet containing a 40-50% protein content, and the stock diet was composed of anchovy (Engraulis encrasicolus) and oysters. The sardine were fed ad libitum throughout the experimental period. The results showed that the sardine that were fed presented a very high Hg excretion in the feces. Mercury values in muscle, skin, and liver, and total mercury (T-Hg) in muscle were similar between the Atlantic sardine groups. However, T-Hg excretion and LOOH levels in liver were significantly higher in the fish that were fed than in the fish that were unfed. The levels of the biomarkers in the muscle and skin were similar among the groups. Our results demonstrate that there was a significant correlation ($r=0.73$) between T-Hg and LOOH levels in the liver of the sardine. The data suggest that diets rich in fish may be associated with higher LOOH levels and that may be useful as a biomarker of oxidative stress.
