Relation of the size of the prostate gland to endometrial histology in surgical samples of endometrial cancer. This study examines the correlation between prostate gland size and histology in surgical samples of endometrial cancer. Using transrectal ultrasound, the size of the prostate gland was retrospectively measured in 179 women (the women's median age was 60 years) who had endometrial cancer and underwent staging surgery at our institution between January 2000 and December 2004. The median size of the prostate gland was 38.5 g for women with a biopsy-proven diagnosis of endometrial cancer, 56.3 g for those who were diagnosed with endometrial cancer on the basis of an elevated serum CA-125 level alone, and 51.3 g for those who had no preoperative biopsy. The median size of the prostate gland was 57.6 g in endometrial cancer without any other histological abnormalities, and 53.9 g in endometrial cancer associated with other pathology. The size of the prostate gland was not significantly correlated with any pathological finding. Although the size of the prostate gland was significantly correlated with age, menstrual status, preoperative CA-125 level and operation method, there was no relation to the pathological findings. The size of the prostate gland is not a marker of endometrial cancer, and thus cannot be used for selection of patients for preoperative biopsy of the endometrium.
