“We were in a pool of raw sewage and water. It was knee deep and was seriously stagnant; therefore something needed to be done.” In 1985, that something was Parkland Junior High, not yet the Parkland with endless hallways and elevators where today a constant thrumming of chatter echoes through the halls. “We were putting up a heat map,” said Lawlor, the principal at the time. “Our students knew that we couldn’t get into our science classrooms because of the water. We realized we needed to do something.” The district’s faculty and community members were involved. “And we started jumping through the window,” said Lawlor. “We tied up the school office and put chairs up against the windows.” “For a couple of weeks,” Lawlor laughed. “Finally, the district took over and changed the windows, put in new doors and walls, added offices.” That was a bit of a lucky break for the school, as the flood could have been much worse. “There were three feet of water in the school.” said Lawlor. “If that would have gone into the classrooms, I don’t know what we’d have done.” -30- Follow local news reporters on Twitter @TamiaCarranza | @kalelwayne | @tamiacarranza | @WFLA | @TashaKourie Sign up for The Florida Times Union’s daily newsletter! Lawlor said she realized the school would never be the same and a different environment would be needed to attract the best students and teachers. “Who we are now is what we got out of it,” said Lawlor. There are 13 high schools in the school district, and the junior high school has been the scene of change in and around the school. In 1997, the current high school was built. The art center was built in 2001, replacing the old gym/auditorium. During the 2004 school year, a number of changes took place to the school. The ninth grade moved to the new building. Academic classes were moved into the art center, and students were put in the gym. The high school became a 2A school.

Q: Brush tool with the Magnifier Glass? How can i place a brush tool with the Magnifier Glass? A: The Magnifier Glass is not used to place anything, it's used to zoom in on an area on the screen. There's no way to do this directly. You can however, use the Paint Bucket tool to copy the content of one area to the destination area or you can use the Fuzzy Select tool. Instead of using the brush tool, you can use the Eraser tool to make a selection and then use the Paint Bucket tool to copy your selection to the new area. Alternatively you could use the Magic Wand tool to select the area you want and then use the Rectangular Select tool to create a new copy of the area. Q: Java how to keep output format consistent between execution of main and subroutine I have a main method (class in question) which outputs a formatted string. Then I have a subroutine that takes data from a different method and then outputs a formatted string to the screen. My problem is, it is inconsistent in what the strings look like. Below is the code for the 1) main method, 2) subroutine and 3) what the subroutine outputs: public static void main(String[] args){ System.out.println("%Sorting%n%nPlease enter 5 fields in order.%nUse / to sort by %f"); Scanner sc = new Scanner(System.in); int sortBy = sc.nextInt(); if (sortBy==1){ String[] fieldList = {"percent", "count", "name", "total", "grade"}; System.out.println("%Sorting by %d field.%nYou can enter %d fields.%n%nFirst field: %s%nLast field: %s%n%nContinue with / to sort by %f%n"); int count = 0; int names = 0;
