It is known to form carbon articles from a pyrolysis of a polymer, and particularly from a pyrolysis of a poly(alkenamer), such as a poly(styrene-butadiene), or a poly(propylene-butadiene) copolymer. These polymers are known to have relatively high solution modulus. As a consequence of the solution modulus of these polymers, the particles of carbon that result from the pyrolysis are generally of irregular shape, and the final product is a spherulitic microstructure. Although this microstructure can be useful for certain applications, for example in certain types of electrodes, it is not always desirable. In particular, the microstructure may be inhomogeneous and the walls of the carbon particles will generally be thicker than desirable for a number of applications. For example, in electrodes, thicker walls reduce the maximum current per area that can be carried by the electrode. In a two-phase zone electrophoresis method, polystyrene-butadiene microspheres are used in conjunction with a carbon article to improve the resolution of the resolving gel, since polystyrene is hydrophilic and hydrophobic

It can be hard to tell who has cancer and who does not, and as a result some patients who have cancer may not get the treatment that would save their lives. Two new studies, one in the European Journal of Cancer Care and the other in the Journal of Clinical Oncology, have found that a lot of patients dying of cancer may not be getting the treatment they need. In fact, a significant percentage of people dying of cancer don't get chemotherapy or immunotherapy — the treatments that are supposed to make the difference in treating their cancer. This is a serious problem, because chemotherapy and immunotherapy are expensive and hard to deliver, particularly to older people or to people with limited means — who may have trouble paying for it, being unable to take time off work to seek treatment.
