Our research is designed to develop and test new experimental approaches to the study of the stimulation of purines in different parts of the nervous system. The initial stages of our studies are directed towards the elucidation of mechanisms by which substances which may be present in the extracellular fluid are able to influence the level of purines in cells. A new procedure for the preparation of a cyclic AMP-deficient synaptosomal fraction from the brain has been developed. This fraction appears to be much less sensitive to the inhibitory action of purine compounds than are normal synaptosomes. An extensive study on the effect of cold exposure on adenosine uptake into synaptosomes has been completed. The results of this study indicate that a significant portion of the uptake of adenosine (5-50%) can be accounted for by diffusion (i.e. the unidirectional uptake), but it is not associated with a high affinity binding. The importance of these findings is unclear at the present time and further studies are underway.A vascular biocompatibility model for evaluating the potential allergenicity of an embedded device. The potential allergenicity of an embedded device (ID) can not be assessed at the first step of a trial. The safe amount of allergen present in the ID must be known. The
