EA will deploy a "dedicated team of motion capture specialists" to capture all of the players in motion. Once the data collection is finished, the development team will have to analyse the data to ensure the animations are realistic and possible. The animation team are then free to start the process of making sure the animations match the real-life data and results in believable movements for the game. It's a massive undertaking, but one the team believe will make the game more fun and immersive for players. To give you an example of the hyper-motions, here's a short video of David Beckham during a 2012 match. In the video above, you'll notice the player uses both feet simultaneously to turn and then accelerate in the movement. It's a fast-paced, versatile movement that's not something we've ever seen in a game before. "FIFA has always been one of the very best-looking sports games out there," said Patrick Söderlund, Executive Producer on the game. "Now that we have real human motion data, we can really deliver a more realistic and dynamic game." What's more is that this new technology will work on a wide variety of players. The team will also be working closely with the actual real-life players to make sure the movements are authentic. The announcement also revealed players will now be able to run into tackles and where they'll go when they hit the ground, as well as step over defenders if they have the ball. For the first time in a FIFA game, players will be able to block shots with their head, as well as swerve and follow up on headers. "This feature, coupled with skills and the ability to change direction using both feet and hands, gives players unique capabilities. We also have shaken things up by not only allowing players to perform technical skills with power, but also providing them with the confidence that the game allows them to do so," said Sebastien Hamel, Head of FIFA Technical. These player-facing improvements will be available in the game as of May 29, while the team is also adding new move-specific animations such as spins, flicks and drifts. There will also be defensive and offensive animations too, such as diving to tackle, and dribbling with a change of speed. To add to that, players can now pick up the ball and curl it around defenders, making it easier
