No problem..From a recent BBC survey on global happiness, the world's largest happiness per capita country is, appropriately, Denmark. Surprisingly, though, the United States ranked 15th. In the United States, life satisfaction is approximately the same as is reported in other wealthy countries with high measures of happiness. To the extent that we are concerned about the health of the current generation, we can and should be concerned about how the youth are doing, which is where the United States does not rank so well. In other countries, young adults are more unhappy, and that has important implications for the future. What if the youth experience greater unhappiness and dissatisfaction in the future? What does it mean for a country's future prosperity and overall happiness? The Future of the American Youth Recent data shows that around the world, the young are not only experiencing unhappiness, but they also are increasingly dissatisfied with their future as well. This is a concern that should be a primary concern of all of us — as was demonstrated by the recent celebrity suicides. We should think about these issues now, and not wait for a mass of young suicides to happen before we take action. Even a few suicides will happen to a mass population of young people; unfortunately, we may never know for sure how many will happen, but it is clear that they will happen. Adolescent risk-taking behavior is usually seen as a natural and necessary part of the youth's maturing process. However, this stage in life is also a dangerous time for experimentation. We are talking about a
