ISO-MOF,RAID10: The Not-So-Simple Way to Make Backup Harder RAID10, or RAID-10(S), is one of the most sought-after RAID (redundant array of independent disks) designs, and as such, it is widely employed in the storage industry to address various data protection needs. We have already discussed the benefits of RAID-10, and also discussed the drawbacks of using RAID-10. However, some of you may be wondering what RAID-10 is. In a nutshell, RAID-10 is a special RAID configuration that protects data through the use of parity. The beauty of this design is that if one of the RAID devices fails, the other RAID devices can automatically re-assign the data partition to the remaining RAID device, thus preserving it. RAID-10 on a multidisk system Let us illustrate what RAID-10 would look like on a multidisk system, in this case, a four-disk RAID-10 system. Here, we have four disks in a RAID-10 system. The RAID-10 stripes the data across these disks. If any of the four disks fails, then the RAID device will automatically re-assign the data partition to the other three RAID devices, and the remaining RAID devices will safely store the data. RAID-10's pros and cons It is worth noting that we are using a system here that allows for four disks in a RAID-10 configuration, and these four RAID 10 devices have three RAID 10 stripes or partitions (since each RAID device must protect data). But our four disks are not the only four disks in the RAID-10 system. As mentioned, there are three RAID stripes. Each RAID stripe is one of the three partitions we have configured. As such, for a RAID-10 system, we are using four disks to create three RAID stripes, a total of nine disks. Let us now look at the pros and cons of using a RAID-10 system. Let us start with the pros. One of the main benefits of using a RAID-10 system is that it is good for disaster recovery

Here is my directory structure: /controllers/ /index.js /admin.js /models/ /routes/ /index.js /admin.js /public/ I'm trying to route to index.html to my /public folder. However, when I use the following: app.use('/public', function(req, res){ return res.sendfile('public/index.html'); }); I get a 404. However, If I do: app.use('/controllers/admin', function(req, res){ return res.sendfile('public/index.html'); }); It works. So my question is, why is it not working the first route? A: Because your index.js is being executed twice. The first time, it returns the correct index.html, but the second time, the route is cached and the index.html is returned, rather than being sent. To fix this, turn off caching with the cache-control middleware: app.use('/public', function(req, res) { res.set('Cache-Control', 'no-cache, no-store, must-revalidate'); res.sendfile('public/index.html'); }); and also set cache-control on your.html files like this: Q: Layout problems in Java Swing I am new to the Java Swing.
