the provision of information alone, seldom result in the development of a learning-relevant strategy. (5)In the last year, In a situation where there are clear costs and benefits (or a learning opportunity) to a particular response the reader is expected to make an immediate decision as to which option to pursue. In our interpretation the strategy posed for the positive option is not to attempt to improve the lower level of accuracy. This strategy would involve a higher level of learning, and so students would likely be motivated to learn from this demonstration. The interpretation of the strategy in the negative option is also not to attempt to improve the lower level of accuracy. This strategy would also be available for the learner, who could choose it as a response strategy if they wanted to. However, if they chose not to, they would be effectively opting for a simpler strategy (i.e., deciding to not learn from this information). The use of strategies is a complex, multi-modal process that occurs in the context of a range of responses that depend on the information and the reader's motivation ([@B12]; [@B11]). In relation to our summary of the results, it is worth pointing out that [@B4] found that the use of strategies was most common in the written scenario where the information is minimal and it is not possible to infer how the reader will respond. Their results also demonstrated that in this scenario, they were found to be the most frequently used strategies. We will point out the similarities between our results for the online scenario and the results presented by [@B4]. They find the same predictors of strategy use for the two online scenarios but also find that they are predictors of strategy use for the traditional written scenario as well. Interestingly, our results suggest that the online scenario is more complex than the traditional written scenario. We might speculate that this is because of the absence of a 'hard copy' (as compared to the traditional scenario) and so it becomes more apparent that the possibility of using a range of responses exists. However, the online scenario does not seem to be significantly more complex than the traditional written scenario and we think that it is unlikely to explain the variation that we see between the situations. The results for the online scenario presented above suggest that it is not the presence of a range of responses that affects strategy use, but the immediate and detailed information that exists in the case of written scenarios. So, in a similar manner to [@B4], the variance in
