More specifically, the present invention relates to a process for producing ethanol from aldehydes. Since the hydrogenation of aldehydes is an important means for producing alcohols, it has been attempted variously to establish a catalytic hydrogenation process for use in a large scale. There is conventionally known a process in which a catalyst of noble metal such as palladium or rhodium is used in hydrogen form, whereas in an aldehyde producing process, hydrogen gas is supplied in aqueous form to the reaction system. It is a well known fact that when a hydrogenated reaction is performed in the presence of a large amount of water, the resulting alcohol is always inevitably accompanied with a large amount of acetic acid (i.e., water-soluble acrylic acid) which is formed by the reaction of hydrogen with acetic acid. When the formed acetic acid is taken to an ethanol producing process, the formed acetic acid is subjected to a concentration step in order to be incorporated into an ethanol. This concentration step results in the formation of a large amount of by-product sodium acetate. Therefore, in order to avoid the formation of such a large amount of by-product, it is necessary to perform an acidification step by using a large amount of alkaline substance such as caustic soda or sodium hydroxide during the concentration step. This acidification step raises the cost of an ethanol producing process. In view of the above problem, there has been proposed a method for reducing the formation of by-product in an alcohol producing process. It is
