galactoside-binding lectin (L-PHA). The DNA sequence encoding the mouse L-PHA lectin has been cloned and sequenced. The mouse and human L-PHA lectin show 80% sequence homology, with a conserved pattern of six cysteine residues conserved in both species. The structural genes for mouse and human L-PHA have been located on chromosome 2q12 and 2p21, respectively. L-PHA is composed of two carbohydrate recognition domains and several cysteine residues characteristic of the structural family of type II C-type lectins, with a short collagen-like peptide at the N-terminal region. The pattern of cysteine residues shows considerable similarity with the mammalian type C lectin from the rat and CD23 (low-affinity IgE receptor) from the human. The mouse L-PHA is encoded by two non-allelic genes that show an alternative splicing mechanism, generating two different transcripts. The transcript with two short introns is exclusively expressed in adult thymus, and its transcript with three long introns is exclusively expressed in fetal liver. In addition to the transcription of the alternatively spliced transcript, an additional non-allelic gene exists. The C-terminal

During the treatment of urban wastewater in the Reggio Emilia WWTP, a significant reduction of the volatile fatty acids, which should be consumed for biomass growth, has been observed in the different treatment stages. The decrease in the average value of the average daily acetate-proton ratio of the incoming wastewater (2.5) was estimated to be equal to the effect of the microbial activity which causes the conversion of acetic acid into volatile fatty acids. The reduction of the above mentioned value (2.1) was estimated to be due to both microbial activity and the growth of biomass. Data obtained from studies carried out in pilot and full-scale experiments, suggest that the removal of the organic matter occurs by means of biological and chemical processes. The biological processes play a fundamental role in the treatment of wastewater, while chemical processes are effective in the treatment of the more difficult to degrade fractions. The variations of water quality observed in the different stages of the WWTP proved to be due to the microbial activity and biomass growth.
