The moves in each of the 22 players are tracked for three minutes in the game. The data analysis is to calculate a player's acceleration, power, speed, speed-over-distance, passing, shooting, heading, interceptions and dribbling in addition to the player's build, flexibility, conditioning, weight and more. It also analyzes how each player uses their body in combat. There are various ways in which you can use a move, including shooting, dribbling, heading or passing. The game determines how high or low you should pass the ball, depending on the context and location of the game, how much time is left on the clock and your current position on the pitch. The moves can be used alone, in groups or even as a combination of moves. EA Sports Institute analyzed all 22 players in motion capture for an average minute of gameplay. It breaks down a player's performance into four categories: Cone of Uncertainty, Acceleration, Player Power and Player Speed. By analyzing data, the game builds a simulation and then uses physics (gravity) to calculate the player's controls in the game. What the players could do in reality is translated into the game. How does "HyperMotion Technology" work? EA Sports Institute used real-world players, who acted as the guinea pigs. They conducted treadmill tests for three minutes, fitted in a motion capture suit and performed high-intensity activities, such as running at full speed, tackling, shooting, heading, passing, receiving a pass, receiving a pass and receiving a pass and headed a ball. They were also required to dribble, or "skate" the ball. The same actions were monitored in the game engine. Then, the data for the player's acceleration, power, speed, speed-over-distance, heading, interceptions and dribbling were analyzed. For example, we analyzed the speed of a player during a 10-meter sprint, the angle at which he accelerates, how much power he adds to his jump, the time it takes him to get to a ball at full speed. All of these physical elements are leveraged to understand how players respond in the game. In addition, the team looked at the types of moves that each player plays, such as shooting, passing, heading and dribbling to deliver the most realistic feel. "Teams are small, but they're fickle. Sometimes they start out with two strikers, then they go for a
