We report a patient with acute respiratory distress syndrome and multi-organ failure due to ABO incompatible allogeneic stem-cell transplantation in which veno-venous extracorporeal membrane oxygenation (VV-ECMO) was used for 3 weeks after transplantation. After transplantation with only permissive anticoagulant therapy, the patient developed acute graft-versus-host disease (GVHD) of the skin and gut with systemic symptoms. These resolved after the addition of low-dose steroids and a reduced immunosuppressant regimen. VV-ECMO was instituted on post-transplantation day 27. Bone-marrow chimerism analysis showed 100% donor chimerism in the peripheral blood and 84% donor chimerism in the bone marrow 6 months after transplantation. The patient showed no signs of infection, graft-versus-host disease or relapse of underlying disease while on VV-ECMO. Our results suggested that the presence of bone-marrow chimerism may be a sign of clinical stabilization of patients with allogeneic hematopoietic stem cell transplantation.Q: Why do some batteries have a common anode and others have a common cathode? Why do some batteries have a common anode and others have a common cathode? A: Why do some batteries have a common anode and others have a common cathode? Why waste space Here's how anode and cathode works in our traditional regular batteries. Cathode reactions: $\ce{A- > 2e- + 2H+ -> H2}$ $\ce{2e- + 2H+ -> H2 + 2e- }$ Anode reactions: $\ce{A -> A- + 2e- }$ So by simply stacking the plates we
