UPD.High-density lipoprotein as a possible source of endothelin in the human blood. High-density lipoprotein (HDL) is the most important antioxidant in plasma, containing alpha-tocopherol at 30-fold higher concentrations than in low-density lipoproteins (LDL). In our earlier investigations, we have demonstrated that HDL has a high cholesterol esterase activity, converting cholesterol esters (CE) to free cholesterol (FC) and fatty acids (FA), thus inducing the cholesterol-metabolizing reverse cholesterol transport (RCT). However, it is unclear whether HDL also has an endothelin (ET)-metabolizing activity. In the present study, to clarify the question, we examined whether HDL can metabolize ET. HDL was isolated from the plasma of healthy volunteers (n = 7), and the CETP activity was estimated. The plasma levels of ET, angiotensin I (Ang I), and Ang II were measured by radioimmunoassay. The levels of ET-1 (8.2 +/- 0.7 pg/mL) were high, while those of Ang II (33.7 +/- 2.8 pg/
