The extent of T cell infiltration (Th1 and Th17 responses) in the inflamed joint tissues, in turn, is considered to be one of the important criteria for the development of arthritis. On the other hand, the CCR5 antagonist used in the present study may suppress both Th1 and Th17 responses and does not exhibit significant adverse effects in animal models, as previously reported [pone.0059096-Fitzgerald2]. Although the precise mechanism is not clear, it is likely that the inhibition of both Th1 and Th17 responses causes suppression of synovitis and joint destruction. Furthermore, both CCR2 and CCR5 may play a role in the migration of inflammatory cells to the synovial membrane, as well as the pathogenesis of arthritis, although the importance of CCR2 may be less than that of CCR5. In an attempt to elucidate the role of CCR2 and CCR5 in the pathogenesis of RA, an *in vivo* study using the anti-CCR2 and anti-CCR5 monoclonal antibodies is needed. The suppressive effects of statins on RA, as well as the therapeutic effects of statins in patients with RA, are still unclear. In the present study, however, statins were effective in decreasing the level of synovitis in CIA rats, and the results suggest that statins may have therapeutic efficacy in RA.
