The information is collected by a series of motion-capture cameras, including Vicon's VXR-10 and VXR-20, which are attached to a set of sensors and ceiling-mounted wireless beacons that transmit data to a central analysis server. And the data is extremely valuable, if someone already has the beacons installed, thanks to the information they gather. Over the course of his life, Michel Platini has met a lot of people. And like many from this sort of establishment, he is used to being recognized. Even if he doesn't particularly like it, Platini has accepted the fait accompli of having his face and his name associated with football. He doesn't even really need to wear an official FIFA badge to be recognized. A standard t-shirt, no matter how worn or dirty, is enough to earn Platini the occasional wry smile. Until now. Because although his status has always been out there, it is only recently that Platini has earned a kind of respect that goes beyond the ordinary. More than 30 years ago, at a party in Paris, he met a young Englishwoman who was about to become his first wife. She was from a mining town in County Durham in England's North-East. "She had seen our logo on some of our shirts," he says, "and she told me that for her, it was a badge of honor and that she would like to carry it on." Platini clearly remembers her and what she said, but once we've taken off the hard-to-read jersey around his neck, he still seems a little surprised. Still, he wanted to share a story that now, in the early hours of July 19, will be one of the key ingredients in the build-up to the FIFA World Cup Brazil 2014 kickoff on Friday, July 12. What Platini doesn't know, in all honesty, is how important he has become, for the next 22 weeks (well, maybe 37 if you happen to be a die-hard FIFPro member), because FIFA's hyper-awareness of his character will serve to build their hype around the World Cup. There is plenty of emphasis on Platini in FIFA 22, because of course he is. But there is also a different sort of emphasis than will be seen in FIFA 13, which
