Researchers from the University of Barcelona have discovered that treatments with atomic hydrogen can be used to kill cancer cells, providing a very useful therapeutic alternative. These experts have demonstrated that the hydrogen dissociates in the inside of the cells, turning the surrounding medium into an asphyxiating environment that kills the cell. In other words, this new therapeutic has a real effect on the cancer cells and represents a very promising advance. The hydrogen can be produced using an oncology nanodevice with an atomic metal inside. The metal is transferred to the cancer cell, creating an atomic network that ensures that hydrogen can be released in the internal environment of the cancer cell. This new treatment represents the first of its kind. It uses the phenomenon of dissociation of hydrogen. In the field of cancer, this is the only treatment to produce this effect. The safety of this approach has been examined at University of Barcelona and they have achieved a lot of positive results. This has been an ambitious research project, though, and one that has proven to be successful. It will now be expanded to the United States. "It's a breakthrough of the highest order, a very promising treatment that, if developed properly and validated, might work with very little effort on the part of the patients," explained researcher Xavier Boeldieu. This treatment is still not available on the market, however, and it will be a few years before it is commercialized. At this point, the efficacy of this method is still being tested, and the final product will be presented at the World Medical Cancer Congress. The goal of the study is to replace current cancer therapies that are very destructive. This research project is still in the early stages, and it could be that in the future, it will be able to directly replace many chemotherapy drugs. The researchers are also examining a new area, which is to use the hydrogen to direct existing therapies against these tumors.

Paranoia over the health threat to children taken into U.S. custody and the terrorists whom the government claims pose a threat to the nation was on full display in congressional testimony Tuesday by two medical specialists. "I am worried," Dr. Jay S. Cohen of the University of Michigan Medical Center testified before the House Judiciary Committee. "I have a 14-year-old grandson and a 9-year-old granddaughter, and I feel like the government is set up to take away their rights and basically drug test them and keep them captive until they are 18 years old." And Dr. Julie Golob of Washington University in St. Louis told the committee "the fact that the Pentagon is giving money to institutions to train mental health personnel seems like a step toward further militarizing mental health" in America. She called for "funds that are more directly related to the needs of clinicians and those in need." The hearing was organized by California Republican Rep. Brad Sherman who sponsored the bill that would reduce the definition of "mental health" to "emotional or psychological distress." "Fears are rational -- there's no doubt about it," Sherman told the committee. "But by attempting to deal with them, it seems to me we are taking steps towards a form of diminished rights and civil liberties that we have heretofore been very careful not to create and not to accept." By contrast, Dr. Peter Breggin, a psychiatrist who has studied the mass grave mass killing of thousands in the U.S. for decades, told the committee that exposure to a fraction of what people in custody are experiencing "is the equivalent of wearing a bomb vest every single day of your life." During a five-hour session, Cohen, an obstetrician/gynecologist and professor of pediatrics at the University of Michigan, said the Bush administration has adopted a policy of detaining children as young as five years old and has done so for fear of what he described as "terrorists -- of all stripes." He said the government has asked doctors in the military to ignore a number of federal laws to "disarm us from fear" in this regard and because U.S. law provides "very little information" about children who are in the custody of the military, it "becomes hard to tell what is happening." Cohen said if a child were incarcerated with adults who have committed violent crimes, the practice "would appear to me to be an act of violence
