Inclusion bodies within discrete brain regions after peripheral nerve lesions. Following motor nerve lesions, the immediate consequence is an ectopic motor activity that may last for several months, depending on the nerve involved and the amount of lesioned axons. This ectopic activity persists, is often unexpected, but sometimes even has a functional significance. In this work, we studied the effect on the motor cortex of 1-month-lasting anterior tibial nerve lesions in rats. In our experimental set-up, we found the following: (1) the antero-posterior size of the lesion was significantly larger than in normal animals; (2) a few electrophysiological abnormalities were detected immediately after the lesion; and (3) inclusion bodies, composed of microtubule-associated proteins, occurred in the motor cortex of lesioned animals. These inclusion bodies were observed both in layer III, where the motor cells are located, and in other layers of the motor cortex. These inclusion bodies were already detected 3 weeks after the lesion in a very limited portion of the motor cortex, but were absent in sham-operated animals. In a normal motor cortex, we found that protein synthesis rate is three-fold higher than that of a normal striatum. After anterior tibial nerve lesion, we also noted an increase in protein synthesis in the motor cortex, which could be related to the inclusion bodies. The present results add to the evidence that inclusion bodies in the neural system are induced by a "double-hit" phenomenon, in which an initial minor insult leads to the generation of inclusion bodies. These inclusion bodies, similar to those observed in other neurologic conditions, are not related to any known intracellular (cellular) disorder. They do not appear to be an epiphenomenon of the ectopic activity, but play a role in the ectopic motor activity. We hypothesize that inclusion bodies may also be involved in 1cdb36666d
