Measurement of dominant-polarity and conducting-polarity surface-solvent-interaction energy in nonpolar and ionic media: The case of the hydration of solutes in aqueous solutions. The electrostatic surface energy (γ_s) of the α -Si(100) surface has been measured in the nonpolar, hydrocarbon solvents toluene, ethylbenzene, and mesitylene, and in an aqueous solution (100 mM NaCl, pH 3.0) by microelectrophoretic techniques and microelectrodes, employing the equivalent toluene concentrations of the solvents. The case of the hydration of the solutes in aqueous solutions (100 mM NaCl, pH 3.0) has been investigated by considering (i) γ_s for the α -Si

A modified parallel-circuit two-chamber dosing system has been developed for the determination of the interaction between verapamil and propranolol in human subjects. The system consisted of an open-flow-through sampling device (Verapamil-Propranolol Dosing Chamber) which contained both verapamil and propranolol. The two-chamber sampling device was designed in such a way that a constant supply rate was used for steady-state sampling, ensuring an unaltered concentration of verapamil and propranolol during the sampling period. A constant flow-through rate was used for the equilibration of the chamber contents with the aqueous drug solutions. The rate of flow-through was set by a pilot balloon assembly, permitting adjustment of the sampling time. Two computerized algorithms were developed for the analysis of the data. A method for simultaneous analysis of the parent and the metabolite verapamil was developed. The concentration of the metabolite was determined by deconvolution of the verapamil peak using the curve-fitting routine. This two-ch
