The outcome of patients with acute lymphoblastic leukemia (ALL) has improved over the past three decades. Nevertheless, the risk of death remains at 10% to 30% and long-term disease-free survival remains at 50%. Although the risks of early death and relapse are reduced by primary therapy, relapse is still the most common cause of death. The impact of using primary therapy on life expectancy is unknown. The authors developed a Markov model to evaluate the effects of primary therapy on life expectancy in the treatment of ALL. The primary therapy was classified as induction, consolidation, or maintenance. Patients who achieved a complete remission were assigned to either intensive consolidation or surveillance. The effects on life expectancy were calculated using the formula for the expected survival for an untreated patient and a standard deviation. This study used the Markov model to develop estimates of life expectancy with primary therapy for adults with ALL. Compared to treatment with primary therapy alone, the combined induction, consolidation, and maintenance therapy prolonged life expectancy by approximately 2 months for men and 3 months for women. The risk of death was reduced by 48%, and the risk of relapse was reduced by 58% by primary therapy alone. If intensive consolidation or surveillance were used for all patients after completing primary therapy, life expectancy was prolonged by approximately 4 months for men and 5 months for women. If the risks of death and relapse were equal after primary therapy, the risk of relapse was eliminated, and the risk of death was reduced by 46% by consolidation therapy or 24% by surveillance therapy. Patients should receive primary therapy as soon as possible, but primary treatment alone is unlikely to prolong the survival of most adults with ALL. A 1-month-old girl presented with failure to thrive and vomiting. MRI showed a cystic mass in the left cerebellar hemisphere. Stereotactic biopsy was performed. Histology demonstrated arachnoid cyst. She was treated with excision of the cyst. The cyst wall consisted of three layers-inner fibrous layer, thickened arachnoid membrane and outer arachnoid membrane. Histologically, the inner fibrous layer was thick, and newly formed vessels and white blood cells were observed. It is supposed that these findings were caused by infection. Follow-up MRI 8 months after operation showed no recurrence of the cyst. Surgery is the most effective treatment for arachnoid cysts. It is important to differentiate these cysts from other supratentorial cysts. Arachnoid cysts in the posterior fossa have several unique features.AsianShares gain after Malaysian crash Singapore shares gained following a massive sell-off in Malaysian stocks after the state-run Malaysian Bernama news agency reported that a state body found white tanks on the floor of the Johor Strait.
