What's New In?

Nextcloud is a user-friendly web-based file storage service that can be used by individuals, small businesses, and organizations. Open Source Free Like this: Like Loading... 't lose a client. But asking a client to pay for a service that they don't need is pretty much professional suicide. If a client called me up and told me they weren't ready to market my services, I would be begging them to pay for what I do so that I could buy groceries. Yes, using the term, "client" has always made me shudder. I'm with Mark. There was a trial in the 1990's where a woman was found guilty of helping her boyfriend kill an elderly client who objected to his attitude towards women. The so-called "kindergarten killer" (I thought it was weiners I was being compared to) was convicted of attempted murder. I'm always being surprised by the number of people who do this sort of thing. One thinks one is the only one, and one isn't. One of the other side-effects of the publicity surrounding these cases is that the barrier to entry for people doing this kind of thing is now very low. Very few people are going to see potential clients for you or keep clients once they've seen what the clients are like, and many of those are going to be cheap clients. And once they see the reality of what a poor job a lawyer does for a client, they are going to call their lawyer to see if they're ready to represent them. It's largely the same scenario with realtors. The sheer number of people who are in this business, particularly at the lower end of the totem pole, is nothing short of stunning. It is, however, a real problem in the upper echelons of the profession and in the bar. It's primarily a problem because it is very costly to the profession. Clients who are simply trying to leverage pricing for better service are forced out of the market. They realize too late that they can't count on being able to get a price advantage from the lawyers, and they end up with more of a cost advantage. As for me, I usually say, "I'm not in the business of competing with my clients." It'
