However, chances are that only a handful will turn out looking great. To fix any imperfections from over- or under-exposure, an old film camera or even an old-fashioned digital camera might be all you need. However, do-it-yourself photo editing software isn't limited to fixing imperfections. You can retouch images so that a single frame is literally better than the whole picture. You can remove unwanted elements, such as a shadow or a distracting person, and add a fun background. You can replace people with cartoons, change an embarrassing picture of you into an artistic photograph, and add special effects to make images more interesting. In fact, you can do almost anything to a photograph that can be done in a home photo lab. If you have photo editing software on your computer, you may think that you're being charitable by donating time and possibly money to downloading and installing the software. However, free software is widely available at the Web site for the company that markets the software, so I provide links to these locations on the Introduction of this chapter. I also include a link for the book's companion Web site (www.PhotoshopForPrintingBook.com) that lists useful downloads to help you accomplish your photo editing needs. Today's software is much easier to use than the early versions of programs. It offers greater editing options and a higher-quality output. Many digital camera models include the ability to automatically adjust exposure settings so that you don't have to worry about a poor exposure result. Some cameras even take multiple shots and pick the best one. However, if you're serious about this art, you'll want to get acquainted with the various functions of your photo-editing software, so that you can do much more than turn out photos that are underexposed.

The research conducted under this proposal is an attempt to elucidate the cellular events which give rise to the lipemia and shock associated with endotoxin (ET) induced acute septicemia. It is also an attempt to develop a new strategy for selective inhibition of the lipemia produced by high doses of ET. ET was originally identified as an essential virulence factor for a number of gram-negative bacterial species. Sepsis is the leading cause of death in US hospitals and to date, no effective antimicrobial agents exist which are able to treat this syndrome. Because of the frequency of endotoxin contamination in water supplies and in animal feed, sepsis is an emerging problem in the food animal production industry. Since the onset of sepsis is triggered by the macrophage, the major work to be conducted under this proposal will focus on the role of the endotoxin receptor, i.e., a newly discovered receptor for endotoxin (ET) on macrophages. At this receptor, once activated by the presence of ET, a cellular signal transduction pathway is activated which includes phospholipase A2, arachidonic acid metabolites and a tyrosine kinase enzyme. Experiments are designed to: 1) Investigate the relationship between the lipemia and shock associated with ET-induced septicemia. It is postulated that lipemia

A pole on which the street or path light is mounted may be located along the pathway or sidewalk and is a source of aesthetic disadvantage to the pathway or sidewalk, and the light may be a source of aesthetic disadvantage to the street or sidewalk. For example, the pole may be an object of curiosity for people walking along the path and/or sidewalk, and may detract from the aesthetic value of the path or sidewalk. Moreover, people using a pathway or sidewalk may be distracted from their travel along the path or sidewalk by the pole, or may be distracted by the pole from other aesthetic features of the path or sidewalk or from their travel. Some street and path light poles are mounted to a pole by passing a rod through a hole in the pole and then threading a lock nut around the pole and onto the rod, to connect the light pole to the pole. The rod may be the only connection between the light pole and the pole. The rod may be rigid, and the light pole may be heavy, such that threading the rod through the hole in the pole may be difficult. A pole may be made from a hardened metal, such as steel or aluminum, or may be made from wood or another non-metallic material. The pole may be bent or otherwise shaped to conform to the contour of a pathway or sidewalk. It may be desirable to mount a street and path light to the pole of the pole prior to the installation of the pole in the pathway or sidewalk.
