In their new study, published in Psychological Science, the researchers analyzed a set of repeated snapshots from a video of a ball moving around a simulated airplane cabin. Their analysis confirmed that while the brain tracks each ball separately, it does so more holistically in one specific brain area: the middle temporal gyrus, in the outer middle part of your temporal lobe. The research confirms the brain’s ability to stitch together dynamic snapshots of an object and shows that this same region appears to be responsible for stitching together a coherent view of how motion takes place in the world. “We reasoned that if the brain could track position of objects over time, it should be able to do that for the same object across different frames of video,” the researchers, led by Michael Tarr of Columbia University and Columbia’s Center for Informing Science, explained in an email to The Scientist. “In the case of moving objects in space, this might help us recognize objects as the same. But even if we can’t just see the ball, we can still get some sense of its identity.” To test this theory, the researchers had volunteers watch more than 5,000 videos of a ball in motion, arrayed into 56 sets of 4 videos. Volunteers were asked to find the ball in each of the videos, although they didn
