The following are some basic Photoshop tips and tricks to make it easier to manipulate an image for a wide variety of purposes: You can edit an image with multiple layers and adjust them independently using various blending modes and layer effects. A layer can be a background or foreground layer, or even a mask for another layer that applies different transparency settings to the underlying layer. Making a change to an image can be a tedious task when you have multiple layers. First, you must navigate to the layers palette. Once there, you must select every layer, and then make your adjustment using the tools, or the Layers panel menu options. Fortunately, you don't have to do this to make some edits. When you bring up the layers palette, you will see layers in the middle of your image (Figure 1). To do so, choose Window > Layers. Figure 1. Bring up the layers palette to add new layers to your image. Figure 2. The type of layer you are adding. Figure 2. You can add a new layer in the bottom of the image, or you can add a new layer in the middle of the image. In this example, we are adding a new layer in the bottom of the image. At the top of the palette, you see the type of layer you are adding (Figure 3). Underneath it, you will see a number of options, including the number of times the layer has been hidden. Figure 3. The type of layer you are adding is listed at the top of the palette. Figure 4. These settings will be saved with the layer. Figure 4. You will see a lot of controls when you bring up the settings for a new layer. Each one of these settings will be saved with the new layer. Figure 5. The colors you choose for the layer come from your image. Figure 5. The colors that have been assigned to the new layer come from your image. In this example, we have added several layers over our black background, and the color of each one should be from the image. Use the Move tool to align images together, place objects on a new layer, or align with a previous layer. You can use the Move tool to find layers in your image, bring up the layers palette, select several layers and change their position in the image all in one step (Figure 6). You can align the background and foreground layers in a color image

By Sable Simon As an instructor of graphic design, I am often faced with the challenge of finding an effective medium to convey complex ideas and concepts, such as product testing, quality assurance, process improvement, or the benefits of company-wide communication. Often, my students are left wondering if simply displaying the information is enough. I have recently encountered a real gem when trying to convey the concept of individual responsibility in a new way. It is a card game called A Game of Pride and Embarrassment that was created by Denise Johns, and is currently in development at a commercial game company. Individual responsibility is an idea that seems to play well with the public, however it doesn't always achieve the desired results. Maybe it's because we tend to think of individual responsibility in individualistic terms, as each of us making our own decisions and acting as responsible individuals. When I introduced this idea to my students, they immediately started talking about individual responsibility in the context of high-profile sports, such as the NFL. We looked back to the 50's and 60's when the Black and White television sets were the new technology of the day. It's estimated that 75% of U.S. households owned one and yet most people refused to sit in front of them. We discussed why people would so willingly be standing in front of their new shiny TV while the player on the screen was sitting in their easy chair. We talked about individuals giving the ball to someone else to pass to him or her. We talked about individual responsibility and how you could prevent people from doing this by letting them know that you have already made the decision that you were going to pass the ball, and that it wasn't up to them to decide if they would be passing it to someone else. In the game of Pride and Embarrassment, you are the individual who is going to start out with a message of responsibility, or a piece of pride, and pass your pride to a player who in turn passes it to another player who in turn passes it to yet another player. When you first read the message on the playing card, it is easy to understand: YOU ARE THE LAST TO KNOW. The message shows each player as the last to receive the information. This concept is conveyed in black and white, as you never see yourself as the first player to receive the message, nor do you see yourself as the last to receive it. When you are the first player to receive the information, you know
