There may be a welcome feeling of closure and a new lease on life for a survivor after a bus crash investigation concludes. There may also be an awareness of just how many people survive, and some of the difficulty they may face, especially those who have been critically injured. The task of examining a crash such as this is always difficult. What often makes it more difficult is that the crash is sometimes on an isolated rural road, with no witnesses, just a few emergency vehicles, and an ambulance on its way to a nearby hospital to treat the injured. It is even more difficult when the crash involves a motor vehicle rather than a freight or passenger vehicle, and especially when the ambulance can't start – as happened in this case – or a large object comes in front of the ambulance. A bus, with a full load of passengers, strikes a utility pole and flips on its side. A man and woman die instantly. Several others remain in the wreckage, most of them with serious or even life-threatening injuries. It's not uncommon for the driver of the bus to lose consciousness immediately or soon after. The risk of a heart attack or stroke often increases the longer a person is trapped in the bus. The task for the emergency medical technicians is to get all the critically injured patients out of the bus as safely as possible, and to ensure they get the best possible medical care available. As a long-time law enforcement supervisor who has seen a number of fatal bus crashes in his time as a police officer and in the 12 years since I retired from the Wisconsin State Patrol, I think about the man who died in this crash all the time. I've seen a lot of people die in crashes, both as a police officer and as a highway patrol supervisor. I've seen people die of a heart attack or stroke, and some of them die "traffic deaths" where the vehicle hits them going down the road. Just as there are police officers who are close to retirement and have their dream jobs lined up, there are other police officers who are close to retirement and have their dream jobs lined up. "Heaven will be different." I often say to families of deceased cops. "Without you, they will be all alone." Like the man who died in this bus crash, the people who come into my world have a chance to leave before they have to do that. But the

For those who enjoy physical activity such as jogging, biking, tennis or other similar sports, one or more injuries may occur due to overuse of muscles. Such injuries may be caused due to repetitive use of certain muscles, for instance, those muscles related to a tennis swing. It is well known that the lumbar vertebrae from L1-S1 may articulate within an intervertebral disk. The intervertebral disk functions to isolate the individual vertebrae and to provide shock absorption. Injuries associated with the intervertebral disk may include, for example, disk degeneration (i.e., bone, fluid, and collagen loss in the disk material), intervertebral disk herniation (i.e., bulging of a portion of the disk out of the normal space bounded by the vertebrae), and tears in the vertebral ligaments that normally stabilize the disks. In addition, injuries to or degeneration of other spinal joints also may occur, such as injuries or degeneration of the cervical and/or the thoracic joints. Moreover, in some cases the intervertebral disk itself may be injured, such as when the intervertebral disk is not properly inserted into the bony arch formed by the vertebral arch of the spine or when the intervertebral disk is not surrounded by a fibrous ligament, or the like. The spine of a typical vertebrate is made up of four small bones called vertebrae. There are different types of vertebrae in the neck, trunk, and tail. While these bones are similar in many ways, they have distinct types of features, including different shapes, surface textures, and internal bony structures. The end result is that the natural spine of a vertebrate has a very high columnar strength in bending, which in turn allows the vertebrate to bend and twist in a wide variety of ways. Vertebrae are primarily subject to three types of injuries: 1) injuries caused by stress or strains while working or participating in sport activities, 2) injuries that result from degeneration in the intervertebral disk that separates adjacent vertebrae, and 3) fractures or breaks in various parts of the vertebrae. An intervertebral disk is not a single, unitary disk. Rather, there are in effect three distinct parts to the disk: the annulus fibrosus; the nucleus pulposus; and a transition zone that separates the annulus from
