Know your Photoshop In this article, we will discuss and show how we can use Photoshop to create various types of effects.

Draw Freehand With the Draw tool, you can add various shapes of basic elements like curves, bezier points and paths to a document. To draw freehand, you can either click the canvas or select a brush. When you click with the brush, you can grab the shape of the brush and drag on the canvas or click and drag on the shape of the brush. You can erase a path or shape with the Eraser tool. You can add a new path or shape using the Arrow tool. You can use the Pen tool or a custom brush to draw what you want. You can draw the tool path by pressing the P key on your keyboard and drawing the path. Or select the Pen tool and draw the path. Fill and Expand Paths If you want to fill or combine two or more shapes into one shape, you can do this by selecting several shapes and using the Pathfinder commands. To select the paths, hold down Ctrl while clicking the paths. Create Similar Elements One of the most basic tools in Photoshop is the Pen tool that is a very useful tool to make precise freehand shapes or create vector paths. You can use the Pen tool to draw a shape, which results in a closed path that can be filled and combined. You can make a filled and closed path by clicking the "Pen" tool or selecting the "Path" tool, using the "Add" tool, and then clicking the canvas. You can use the Polygonal Selection tool to make a selection. Select Similar Objects Selecting the correct objects is an essential aspect of work with Photoshop. Just like with other types of software, you have to know how to select the correct objects with the right tool. For example, it is easier to select a circle by using the Pen tool and drag the shape instead of clicking with the mouse. Create Custom Brushes You can create or edit custom brushes. When you create a custom brush, you can use it in any selected tool. When you select a brush on the tool panel, it shows up with the tip of the selected tool. You can drag the tip to change the shape of the brush. To create a new brush, click on Brush on the top menu and select the Brush tool and drag a new brush. Or you can select Custom Brush on the

Falling solar prices and the rise of renewables have not only boosted grid revenues but also have cooled the huge industry-wide push for a global carbon tax on fossil fuels. This has been driven by the search for ways to compensate countries with large quantities of coal and gas reserves, to combat climate change. Many countries have considered a carbon tax as a key policy tool against climate change in the hope that the revenues raised will make them less dependent on international markets for fuel. Deutsche Bank has this week published research that supports this view. It has concluded that some countries could maintain their coal use even if they all paid the same carbon tax. It finds that in some cases the effective carbon price will be much lower than the tax rate. But this is not the only way in which countries can mitigate their exposure to international markets for coal. In two new papers, Deutsche Bank argues that the financial risk of carbon pricing can be mitigated through the use of carbon risk hedges. The first, by Deutsche Bank, is a case study of Australia, while the second paper is a further exploration of the carbon risk hedge approach and the paper focuses on Europe. Overall, I believe the policy stance on carbon pricing should be driven by the goal of helping countries to improve their financial risk profiles, rather than by the wish to replace international market prices with a domestic carbon tax. How to hedge the risk of carbon prices Deutsche Bank argues that hedging should be an integral part of any carbon pricing programme. The Treasury's own modelling on carbon pricing – which found that carbon policy would raise up to $16.6bn in 2012-13 – included substantial hedges. Deutsche Bank argues that market risks can be hedged through the use of carbon futures contracts and other derivatives. But, it says, governments might have the opportunity to mitigate carbon risks in different ways. These can include reductions in coal production, increasing the efficiency of coal use in the power sector, the development of energy-saving technologies and a combination of these strategies. In its paper, Deutsche Bank explains the risk of carbon prices through a series of case studies on different countries, including Germany, France and Poland. This approach, which it says is “safer” than conventional hedging schemes, shows that the financial risk of carbon pricing can be mitigated. Why carbon risk hedges are desirable Australia In Australia, Deutsche Bank says its carbon risk hedges
