Near-infrared spectroscopy (NIRS) has been proposed as a noninvasive technique for measuring changes in cortical neural activity and function, while avoiding direct tissue stimulation by electrodes. In this study, we used NIRS to measure responses to emotional face stimuli in a group of healthy volunteers. The task was to identify the emotional content of a series of briefly presented faces. We demonstrated that NIRS can detect changes in hemodynamic responses to facial expression of emotion in facial regions that overlap with those involved in emotional face processing. A significant signal was demonstrated to happy and surprise facial expressions in the temporal face region, and to angry facial expressions in the right frontal face region. Overall, the emotional stimuli produced significantly more activation in the right
